

Many Grubhub customers experience frustration and longer-than-expected wait times because restaurant staff mark orders as "ready for pickup" in their system before the order is actually made. This results in large crowds of customers waiting for their food to be made, which can pressure workers into potentially overloading themselves with orders and running out of ingredients.